Dear Bernardus, D; Murwani, FD; Ardyan, ...

Warmest greetings!

Your

article

with the title Which psychological characteristics strengthen "The entrepreneurial intention-action relationship"?: An extension of the theory of planned behavior which has been published in COGENT BUSINESS & MANAGEMENT has impressed us a lot.

Here attached the abstract of your research which has impressed us most:

1. Title: Which psychological characteristics strengthen "The entrepreneurial intention-action relationship"?: An extension of the theory of planned behavior
2. Abstract: This study extends the literature of the theory of planned behavior in the context of entrepreneurship. Specifically, this study is intended to verify which psychological characteristics moderate the relationship between entrepreneurial intention and entrepreneurial action. Internal locus of control, innovativeness, and performance goal orientation are proposed to moderate "the entrepreneurial intention-action relationship", because those variables have the likelihood for individuals to take action to start a new business. Adopting a cross-sectional design, the data were collected from 188 undergraduate students who participated in an entrepreneurship project and analyzed using hierarchical regression analysis. The results demonstrated that internal locus of control was found to strengthen "the entrepreneurial intention-action relationship", whereas innovativeness and performance goal orientation did not moderate that relationship. The findings provide practical implications not only for entrepreneurs to consider internal locus of control and entrepreneurial intention in starting a business, but also for entrepreneurship educators in developing a start-up business curriculum based on students' psychological characteristics.
